Marie Dean's passion for art endures through generations

Rose Pierre will provide a quick weaving lesson to just about anyone who's game.

"Here's how you do it..." she says as she reaches on the floor beside her rocking chair and sweeps up three thin strands of cured palmetto leaves – not the rigid fan-like leaves but ones that are carefully selected from the heart of the plant.

In two shakes of a lamb's tail she produces about six inches of neatly-folded, tight-fitting braid that can be made into any number of items.

"There, that's how my mother did it," she says with a wide smile, holding the braid out for a visitor to see.

Well, maybe not exactly that way. After a moment to inspect her work, Rose soon points out certain imperfections that her mother never would have tolerated.

"She could actually do it a lot straighter and a lot better than that," Rose says. "She would keep braiding it until she got it just right, and if I didn't get it right she would make me undo it and start all over again. You have to have a lot of patience."

Rose isn't overly critical of her own work because she knows that few could measure up to the precision and skill of her mother, the late Marie Antoinette Billiot Dean, who passed away at the age of 94 in her home in Dulac last September even as she was in the process of stitching together a new hat. (Acct. No. 9677703)

The family matriarch was a key figure in the preservation of the centuries-old culture of the United Houma Nation in southeast Louisiana. A member of the Louisiana Folklife Center Hall of Master Folk Artists, her unique hand-crafted baskets, purses, sun hats, moss dolls and other items have been on display at the Smithsonian Institution since 1989.

Her work can also be seen in the Louisiana Folklife Museum and the Southdown Plantation House in Houma and has been featured in many other venues as well, including the Natchitoches-NSU Folk Festival, the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival and the 1984 Worlds' Fair.

The interest in hand-crafted art is a passion that was passed on to Rose and the rest of her family and has been shared with many in the Houma area through the classes and programs Marie once taught in the public school system.

"I used to sit and watch my grandmother for hours," says Rose's daughter, Maria Pierre. "I used to go with them to a lot of the fairs, festivals and arts and crafts shows and people would be fascinated with her work. I can say I learned from the best."

Maria says she intends to maintain the tradition passed down from her mother, her grandmother and her great-grandmother Josephine Lodrigue Billiot and adds that her 8-year-old son and his friends are even interested in learning other aspects of the Houma Nation arts culture that can be found along Bayou Grand Caillou and the surrounding area.

Maria admits it's hard to get the younger generation interested in hand-crafted art because of the perseverance and painstaking labor that's required, especially when sports, video games and high-tech computer programs are there to compete for attention. Just selecting, gathering and preparing the palmetto fronds takes many days, while the moss used to create dolls and figurines takes even longer to cure, clean and finally stitch together. (Acct. No. 8594001)

One of Marie's greatest champions and partners in preserving the Native American culture was Roy Parfait, a fellow Houma Nation artisan and woodcarving specialist who used to perform demonstrations and teach public school classes with Marie. He was interested in taking her overseas to Paris to discuss and exhibit her work several years ago, but ill health and a lack of wanderlust squashed the idea.

Marie was always more content to stay home on the bayou. In addition to immersing herself in the culture of her homeland, she spoke primarily French, like her parents before her.

Though the surviving family members say they miss Marie, they still have her art and the words she offered to encourage quality of craftsmanship.

"When I'm weaving I can still hear her saying in my ear, 'You've got to give it some loose, you've got to give it some loose.'" Rose recalls. "You can't have it too tight when you're stitching. She believed if you're going to do something, you might as well do it right."

And they also have that unfinished hat Marie was working on when she suddenly collapsed and passed away. Rose thought about completing it but decided to leave it as it is, an enduring testament to her mother's life and her craft.
